The legend of Charles Darwin

Amongst the tall, green grass of Galapagos islands, lives a menacing Basilisk, known for being bigger than a house, lurking in the dark corners of the island. It's venomous fangs, which is able to inject poison into your skin in the matter of seconds; teeth as sharp as razors, and a scaly tail, that is longer than a tree trunk. The poisonous creature was one of the most dangerous snakes on Galapagos.

Despite many men attempting to defeat the beast, no one has ever defeated it; the Basilisk was overpowered.

Within the heart of Victorian London, Charles Darwin, a experienced scientist, who is as strong as a horse and as intelligent as a wise owl. While some people know him for being a scientist, some know him for being a powerful, mighty warrior. Darwin's beard, which is extremely long, is as white as a ghost, as he is one of the only men who the Londoners know and love. Charles Darwin is known throughout the world, with his tremendous beard.

While bullets of rain shot down from the grey clouds, Charles Darwin and his loyal crew sprinted in the damp, wet mud to the Beagle. Once the crew finally clambered on board, weather got even worse. Thunder struck. Lightning flickered. The hail was dropped by the clouds above. Despite the extreme weather, Darwin stayed strong. They all had one goal: defeating the Basilisk. The trees hair tangled in the wind. Unexpectedly, a glimpse of sun broke through the clouds. Was this a miracle? But Charles Darwin wasn't focused on the weather; he was focused on the Basilisk.

The boat shook from side to side. The sun broke through the clouds Charles Darwin felt a slight relief because he saw something in the distance. It was an island! Darwin gave a curious look and turned to his crew. "Do you see this, boys?" Darwin announced, in a puzzled look. It was silent, so silent, he could hear the waves crash against the boat. The journey continued. After a while, they finally reached the peculiar island. Thoughts raced through his mind. Was this the home of the Basilisk? Why did his crew go silent once he asked a question? He ignored these and clambered onto the island. Darwin was speechless. A tall, colossal snake-like figure stood there. The man's heart pounded. He did ~~not~~ want to battle this creature, but now that he was stood in front of it, he was mortified. Charles didn't want to do this now.

Although Charles Darwin was scared to battle the massive creature, he wanted to make his younger self proud. He got ready for battle. The Basilisk looked confused. "You can't defeat me" the creature said in a stern voice. The Basilisk clearly disliked him. The Beast leaped forward, sinking his venomous teeth into the man. Darwin did not react, and pounced forward. Darwin hit him with endless attacks. He did it - he defeated the Basilisk.
